

How to improve social care so that learning disabled people can live good lives

We want to

- Understand what a good life is for learning disabled people

- Find out how to help learning disabled people to have a good life

- Make sure support workers and other social care workers understand how to make this happen

We will

- Ask learning disabled people what makes them happy

- Ask family carers what they think a good life is for their relative

- Work with support workers to find out how to help people lead a good life

- Make an online guide to share this information.

- Tell lots people and organisations about this website and what a good life means

About this project

- The project is based at the University of Oxford

- The money for this project comes from the National Institute for Health Research

Who works on this project?

- A team of people who work at these organisations

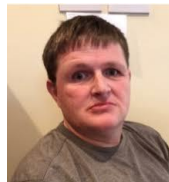

- Learning disabled people and people who support them

- Dr Sara Ryan is in charge of the project

- Dr Siabhainn Russell is the researcher

- Stuart McMurray is learning disabled and works on this project

- Angeli Vaid is a family carer and works on this project